Notes: Ø If you find yourself correcting typos or just keeping track of changes, then WordFinder may help. This is a really powerful tool that will make your job of document redaction much easier. You can use it to replace certain characters. (First one has one minor, and the second one has three minor spelling errors. It's not like the original is flawless.) You can use this to find words like "man", "people", etc. If you take the time to practice, you can get really, really good. Even if you read only one thing in your life (like this entire web page), you'll get a lot better with time. Example 1 Here's a simple example I created. I removed the comma in the middle of the word. I removed the apostrophe between the "g", "he", and "e" in the word "girly" and I removed the apostrophe in the word "she". (Need I say more?) Example 2 You'll also notice that I removed the "e" in the word "you". This is because when you use TextAloud, you'll see this in bold: Non-bracketed text is spoken. Bold text is spoken, however this is not. The text appears in normal color. (The "e" in bold is the text you have just read to this point, and it's not the text you should be saying.) If you look at the bracketed text, the final "e" will be spoken (not bolded). The differences are fairly basic, so if you use it, you'll learn pretty quickly. So it's not too hard, but it's also not a walk in the park. Please remember that: In English, many words change between spoken and written forms. That's not always obvious. You could understand what a person says, and then see the next word and think, hmmm..... so then you read that word, and think, what is that? It's not until you read it a few times that you understand the pattern (
